LORE OF THE FLEET CHARACTER-SKETCHES - RALPH BY TOM KROWE

One of the first characters to be introduced in the novel, Lord of the Flies by William Golding is Ralph. He can be described as being with "fair hair", around twelve years old, with a confident and intelligent nature. He is the first to suggest that the boys should elect a leader to help them survive on the island. He is also the first to suggest that the boys should elect a leader to help them survive on the island. He is also the first to suggest that the boys should elect a leader to help them survive on the island.

Ralph's ability to lead is a key factor in the novel. He is the first to suggest that the boys should elect a leader to help them survive on the island. He is also the first to suggest that the boys should elect a leader to help them survive on the island. He is also the first to suggest that the boys should elect a leader to help them survive on the island.

As the novel progresses, Ralph and Jack begin to quarrel. Ralph is left by Jack and a group of other boys. This is due to his lack of leadership towards the other boys. At this point in the novel he also starts to lose confidence in Piggy as a good friend. The further the novel progresses the more people leave Ralph and the less confident he becomes in himself and his ability to survive. At the very end of the novel he has changed from a person who is innocent to a person who understands the human nature and will do what he must to survive. This is shown in the novel as the end saying, "Ralph says for the end of innocence, the darkness of man's heart, and the fall through the trees of the trees, that there shall be a fire."

Following the killing of Piggy, Ralph's personality and experiences to convey the idea that the world is not as good as it seems. He is shown through the actions of Ralph which symbolize the actions of the world that he is in. He is shown through the actions of Ralph which symbolize the actions of the world that he is in. He is shown through the actions of Ralph which symbolize the actions of the world that he is in.

Through the novel, Ralph's character changes and develops many different characteristics. He starts out as a confident and intelligent young boy who is the leader of a group of boys. Near the end of the novel he is shown as a person who is being hunted by the other boys and is in a state of fear. This situation can be instantly inflated by his actions for other boys, his lack of confidence, and his lack of leadership. From the events in the novel Ralph is used to show the state of the world of social order due to his lack of rules and laws.
